Annafaye is a member of the Business Law team at Miller Thomson in Montreal, where she practices in mergers and acquisitions, corporate and commercial law. A graduate of McGill University, she served as editor-in-chief of the Sustainable Development Law Review, illustrating her entrepreneurial skills and commitment to important causes.

Passionate about travel and different cultures, Annafaye balances her professional and personal life by practicing yoga, running, and spending time with her loved ones. Her ability to combine legal rigor and personal well-being makes her an attentive and committed advisor.

A dynamic, multidisciplinary lawyer, Annafaye has acquired a wide range of legal experience through international internships. Her varied background enables her to offer innovative perspectives tailored to her clients' needs.

Industry involvement

Community roles

Due to her interest in sustainability, Annafaye sought out leadership roles that would allow her to work on these issues during her legal studies. During her time at McGill, she served as the Publications Officer for the Centre for International Sustainable Development Law and as the Managing Editor of the McGill Journal of Sustainable Development Law. In these roles, she worked to facilitate research and create awareness on human rights, climate change, and social justice issues.

She also volunteered as a caseworker at the Concordia Student Union Legal Clinic and the COVID Law Hive Legal Clinic. During her time as a volunteer, she worked on cases in diverse areas of law, including immigration law, consumer protection law, and employment law.
